Outline

As a result of an ongoing dialogue between Umeda Tetsuya and Oh Haji after receiving the award, the artists chose “Wetland” as a title for this exhibition, inspired by the role of “water” as a common element that their respective recent work revolves around.

Oh has been working on the “Grand-Mother Island Project” since 2017, and at this occasion she showcases the project with a newly added work. Utilizing the support for overseas activities that is part of this award, Oh conducted research about Ama divers on Jeju Island, before visiting places in Japan, Korea and Australia – three countries that the artist has personal relations with – to trace people’s memories in a manner of dissolving existing boundaries. In addition to materials, weaving and dyeing techniques that are closely linked to the respective local contexts, she used several other media such as photographs, sounds and texts, and put all these parts together into an installation. Sceneries of islands, made up of real and virtual images, emerge as places for sharing the memories of other people that have fallen by the wayside in the course of history, and inspire the viewer to use their imagination.

While visualizing the environment that surrounds the museum’s architecture, Umeda lightly intervenes and attempts to transform the system of the art exhibition itself. He uses scaffolding to set up a new walkway, and a motor to move the interior wall that is used for displaying works, to ultimately create multiple layers and new pathways within the exhibition space. His objects and sounds containing elements of light, water, air, and wind that exist at points across the museum’s interior, not only suggest the nature of the ground on which the museum was built, but they also function as connectors between the exhibition space and the remote locations that appear in Oh’s work.

“Wetland” provides a stage for two very different artists to show their works independently yet in a mutually stimulating collaborative format. Together they create an ambiguous kind of place where the real world that we live in coalesces with the museum’s exhibition space.

Particular importance is given to the need to provide the best possible support at the optimal time in the artist's career.
